

Tracing the origin of the Documentary Hypothesis through the centuries, Edward Andrews investigates the assumptions and presuppositions underlying the theory, critically analyzing the original Bible text and addressing popular issues and authorial concerns. By comparing the textual evidence and the commentaries of scholars from the past four centuries, Andrews effectively debunks the Documentary Hypothesis, providing a conservative approach that lifts up the first five books of the Bible as being authored by Moses in addition to demonstrating that they are reliable and factual information, as well as consistent truth. In this publication Andrews has offered current thought on the matter, as well as, taken some of the best apologetic authors over the past century and has updated their material, to offer an understanding of how higher criticism has infested our secular universities, as well as most of our seminaries. The reader will have the tools to defend Mosaic authorship against the critics, and help those who may have begun to doubt.
