

Arm in arm Louisa and her dearest friend strolled their last morning together through Pamelias garden. Tulip bunches nosed green spikes up out of the cold hard earth. Daffodil stems crowded the picket fence. Louisa reached for the barren sweetbriar shrubbery and rubbed a twig between her fingers. If only they were in bloom, she whispered to her friend, wishing to see the pink rose, the five petals, the threaded veins of darker pink. Pent up tears suddenly gave way. I just wanted one, just one. I wanted to take something with me to Oregon, something from home to hold onto. They both cried then, and held to each other, overcome by the bitter sorrow of their enforced departure. I just cant say good-bye, whispered Pamela. Its like being torn asunder! A robin hopped close and cocked his head. He hopped away unnoticed. Suddenly Louisa pulled back. The sweetbriar seeds we gathered last year! You have them in your bureau, Pamela! Go get me half! As soon as I get to the Promised Land Ill plant them, send word to you, and you can plant yours! The sweetbriar will be a tryst between us! Pam dashed off. In a moment she was back, the seeds tucked inside a clean linen cloth. She was smiling, and the smile, coupled with the tear-luster of her blue eyes, made her radiant. Its a promise! she sang out breathlessly, happily pushing the seeds into Louisas open hands. Blossom cover thorns! Remember that, Liza! Look for the beauty, the spring! Louisa clutched the cloth in one hand, then threw her arms about her friend. A lovely thought...straight from God, I think. We will meet again, Liza. Not on this earth, I know, but on the other side--where well not be called to part. Louisa nodded. Not ever. Still holding to Pamela, she was unwilling to let go. You write when you and David marry? Pamela asked her softly. Louisa whispered, You know he doesnt know I exist... Shh, hush, my friend. Look for the spring, remember? Because spring will a
