During the artillery fire preceding the attack, and while the attacking infantry is yet out of effective range of small arms, it will be desirable to keep the shooting line well covered; in trenches they will be very fairly so, but behind walls it will be often necessary to provide either field-casemates (para. 123) or deep shelter trenches; a few sentries left on the front line will watch the advance. It is not advisable, though it may be necessary, to place guns in the shooting line, on account of liability to capture and frequent difficulty of retreat from a much exposed position. Rather should they be on the flanks, somewhat retired, throwing a cross fire on the field of attack and commanding the roads (Fig. 1, Pl. XXXVIU), or on high ground in rear. A portion of the shooting line must be as usual told off as Support. supports, their duty being to make good losses, and to help in driving out the enemy in case of partial penetration of the first line. Their numbers need hardly ever exceed half of the front line; they must be covered from fire either in the field-casemates or deep trenches before mentioned; or behind, or in, buildings close at hand, when this can be done with safety. To provide additionally against the partial penetration of the first line by small bodies of the enemy, short lengths of wall, TM hedge, &c., which may run perpendicularly to the shooting line and within it, should be prepared for defence, in order to prevent the assailants who may have forced their way in from spreading along the line. This arrangement also favours the division of the place into defensive sections. 147. In case of the failure of...
