

Buildings, monumental sculpture and other records have been destroyed during periods of great upheaval, but sculptured ivories remain in such numbers that, from them alone, we may learn the customs, dress and domestic arts that marked the successive centuries. Although ivory was employed freely for articles used in religious and domestic life, no reference need be made here to such objects anterior to the Consular Diptychs, or writing tablets, which were introduced in the days of the Roman Consulate, continuing from the fourth to the middle of the sixth century, a period of about a hundred and fifty years. Although only about fifty of these exist to-day, preserved in European Museums, they throw light on the customs of the Romans and are of great historical importance.
